Tea is a diverse beverage that comes in various forms, each with its own unique flavor, aroma, and health benefits. Understanding these categories helps tea drinkers appreciate the subtleties of different types of tea. The primary categories of tea include black, green, white, oolong, and herbal tea, each derived from the Camellia sinensis plant or other plant sources.

Black Tea

Black tea is the most oxidized of all tea types, giving it a bold flavor and dark color. It is the most consumed tea in the world, often enjoyed with milk or sweeteners. Some popular varieties include Assam, Darjeeling, and Earl Grey. Its strong flavor profile makes it a favorite for breakfast teas.

Green Tea

Green tea is minimally processed, allowing the leaves to retain their green color and fresh taste. With a lighter flavor compared to black tea, it is known for its health benefits, including antioxidants that help combat free radicals. Popular varieties include Sencha, Matcha, and Gyokuro.

White Tea

White tea is the least processed of all tea types, made from young leaves and buds. It has a delicate flavor and is often praised for its subtle sweetness. Silver Needle and White Peony are famous varieties, known for their light, floral notes.

Oolong Tea

Oolong tea is partially oxidized, falling somewhere between black and green tea. It has a rich and complex flavor profile, often with floral or fruity notes. Tie Guan Yin and Da Hong Pao are well-known oolong varieties, celebrated for their unique characteristics.

Herbal Tea

While technically not a tea from the Camellia sinensis plant, herbal tea is a popular infusion made from various herbs, spices, and flowers. Chamomile, peppermint, and rooibos are common herbal teas, each offering its own health benefits and delightful flavors.
